Cooperation has been a hallmark of Baptist life for centuries. It’s a concept lived out even by the earliest Baptists, who although empowered by the freedoms of autonomy and soul liberty, opposed the traditional parish mentality and sought to work with other believers to broaden the effectiveness of their outreach into the world.

That commitment to mutual ministries continues today at all levels of American Baptist life. Local congregations find partnering with other Christian bodies often provides opportunities to more dynamically address the...

needs and callousness of an increasingly secular society. At the regional, national and international levels as well, vital work in the name of the Gospel has been done ecumenically.

Such partnering has not come without concerns. Some have been “skeptical of ecumenical movements or of interchurch cooperation beyond the most practical sharing of resources in mission or local community activities.” Further, “American Baptists, always at the table for initial discussions of ecumenical endeavors…often struggled with resistance from some within their constituency.”

And yet the prayer of Christ for His followers, in their lives and their mission, “that they be one” has long inspired most American Baptists to support—and celebrate—the work likeminded Christians can do together to fulfill the Great Commission.

In the twentieth century that work reflected an emerging global perspective. Northern Baptists supported the formation and objectives of the Baptist World Alliance in 1905, and formally joined as one of its earliest member communions after forming as a denomination in 1907. And in the years following World War II, American Baptists were among those denominations fulfilling the mandate of Acts 1:8 by launching the far-reaching ministries of the World Council of Churches (1948) and National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. (1950). In all these endeavors—and countless ecumenical partnerships at regional and local levels—American Baptists have committed themselves both to cooperative ministries of outreach and justice and to maintaining our historically distinctive beliefs as a Christ-centered tradition in that process.

In his 12 years as American Baptist Churches general secretary, Rev. Dr. A. Roy Medley has traveled countless thousands of miles; attended innumerable gatherings, worship services and celebrations in the U.S. and abroad; and met with a host of ecumenical and church leaders—all in an effort to fulfill the Gospel mandate in partnerships with others who call Jesus Christ Lord and Savior.

As Medley begins his role as the chair of the National Council of Churches (NCC) Governing Board this year, he does so with a clear vision: “We have gifts to share; we have gifts to receive. We are not the only people of God.”

Our quest to engage spiritual neighbors in dynamic, productive work is not new. More than a half century ago, American Baptist leader Rev. Dr. Edwin T. Dahlberg served as NCC president with an equally straightforward perspective on the power and scope of cooperative Christian ministry: “Jesus did not confine himself to so-called matters of comfort, peace of mind and family conduct, but spoke out on the public questions of the day…. We have a biblical mandate to enlighten the conscience of our generation on the life and death issues of our day.”

Another American Baptist leader, Dr. M. William Howard, also brought his denomination’s commitment to living out the Gospel mandates by joining with others when he served as NCC president 1979-1981.

This longstanding American Baptist perspective has manifested itself in many ways and places, and among many similarly motivated people of faith in the U.S. and around the world.

As the third millennium of Christian witness opened, new opportunities for cooperative ministry presented themselves. Within our tradition, “Baptists Together,” a 1999 conference of denominations seeking better mutual understanding and unity, challenged participating bodies to apply the biblical call to unity in outreach and service. “Christian Churches Together” formed early in the last decade to involve 34 church organizations to consider “the need for expanding fellowship, unity and witness among the diverse expressions of Christian faith today.”

Even before he began as ABC general secretary at the beginning of this new millennium, Dr. Medley knew clearly that American Baptists—“as a people motivated by mission, the heartbeat of our life”—needed to look for cooperative opportunities for productive service and dialogue.

Since then—in Burma, the Philippines, Thailand, Cuba, the U.S. and dozens of other locations—he has engaged religious leaders and organizations to seek a common witness in areas of need ranging from peacemaking and religious freedom to interfaith dialogue. In many places where oppression and apathy are formidable realities, such work requires a definite stepping out on faith.

Patience, however, often provides genuine inspiration. Most recently, in December of 2013, Medley helped to celebrate the Judson bicentennial by worshipping with and encouraging Christians in Burma’s Chin State and at the Myanmar Institute of Theology in Rangoon. Recalling the words of Adoniram Judson, the Baptist missionary who planted the seeds of Christian faith there in 1813, he said, “We still believe this: For you the future is as bright as the promises of God.” In Burma, as elsewhere, Medley’s message calls for continuing hope and service—and partnership. In a country long embroiled in ethnic and religious oppression, the light of hope has encouraged both Burma’s Christians and their overseas partners.

Beyond ecumenical ministry, American Baptists understand as well as any people that engagement with the wider world is a biblical mandate. In this we follow in the footsteps of the pioneering leader Roger Williams, who while uncompromisingly Christian in his worldview, also saw that God’s call to establish the Rhode Island colony in 1636 mandated community and communication with people of other, even non-Christian traditions.

The Baptist/Muslim Dialogue, begun several years ago to open channels of communication and understanding, is such a contemporary manifestation: an ongoing opportunity to listen to and share perspectives from radically different faith traditions. In doing so, while maintaining a Christ-centered perspective, we allow for the possibility of cooperation in areas of mutual concern—peace, hunger, human trafficking and other core societal challenges. For General Secretary Medley, his active participation in these discussions reflects “our desire as Jesus’ disciples to follow His teachings about peace, and are in accord with Baptist convictions about the centrality of religious liberty in civic life.”

In his new role as chair of the NCC Governing Board and his ongoing responsibilities that support ecumenical and interfaith discussion, American Baptist General Secretary A. Roy Medley continues a tradition that has drawn heavily on partnerships. “Our faith as American Baptists always has been a generous one with other Christians. In a world so much in need of healing and redemption there are countless challenges we are called to face together. And, with God’s blessing, we will continue to need each other for that task.”

1. Down by the Riverside: A Brief History of Baptist Faith by Everett C. Goodwin (Judson Press, 2002; page 43).

Rev. Dr. Don Ng began a two-year term of office as president of American Baptist Churches USA in January 2014. A longtime denominational leader, Ng was on the staff of Educational Ministries for 20 years (1978–1998), directing Discipleship and Youth ministries, and providing leadership in curriculum development and camping and conferencing ministries. He also has been a member of the Executive Committee of the American Baptist Home Mission Societies, and president of the Asian American Baptist Caucus, among other responsibilities. Since 1998 Ng has served as senior pastor of historic First Chinese Baptist Church in San Francisco, one of four congregations across the U.S. profiled in the denomination’s recent Transforming by the Spirit video.

President Ng recently shared the following perspectives on his ministries and denominational identity.

Q: You bring an obvious passion and commitment to your new role as president of the denomination. How important have American Baptists been in your life journey?
A: Never in my best mind would I have thought that a little boy from Boston would end up becoming president of ABCUSA! When my father served honorably in WWII with the U.S. Army, he returned from Germany to Boston as a U.S. citizen. With the legal ability to sponsor my mother and older brother from China, it was the First Baptist Church of Boston that assisted him. I was born in the shadows of Fenway Park and Baptist heroes like Samuel Stillman and Isaac Backus. I can actually say that if it wasn’t for the American Baptists, I would not have been born!

Every stage of my life has been a blessing beyond my imagination. I grew up at FBC Boston and became active in the Baptist Youth Fellowship. When the American Baptist Convention met in Boston, I served as a page for General Secretary Edwin Tuller. Gordon College and Andover Newton Theological School provided me with the foundation for my ordination in 1975, and my life and career just took off. I know that from all statistics and church/denominational analyses, denominations are declining and everyone is scrambling to discern God’s calling and new directions. But from my personal life experiences, American Baptists have been my life and my lifeline! I’m proud of being an American Baptist, for all of our heroes and strengths, as well as for our challenges and weaknesses.
Serving Christ as a minister for the past 39 years, I think I have always stepped out in faith. I found myself never needing to look for a job—opportunities came to me and I just stepped through the door. And God continues with blessings. Perhaps that’s a key to revitalization and transformation—the need to trust in God’s power and action in our lives and in the world. By becoming over bureaucratized and highly professional, have we lost our sense of calling and trusting in God’s ways? I know that when I left Educational Ministries after serving for 20 1/2 years and accepted a call to First Chinese Baptist San Francisco in 1998 with a significant change in my salary, I believed that this was what God wanted me to do with my life. I wasn’t trying to be a martyr in any sense, but when the congregation heard about this, they rededicated themselves to the church and said that if the pastor is willing to move cross-country and be with us, we need to step up too. And they have in very significant ways!

Q: How can the distinctive mission of American Baptist Churches effectively speak to the needs of an increasingly secularized society? How can we be relevant, transforming agents for the Gospel message?
A: It may just be that denominational structures that we have come to know for the past 40 years have lived out their days; thus the restructuring that ABC did two years ago. But when we believe that God is alive and working in our lives and through our religious institutions to bring about equity, peace and justice, new life is upon us. I believe in this, and that’s the reason why I want to serve as ABC president.

In the face of secularism and pluralism in society, I believe that American Baptists are best suited to be proclaimers of the Gospel and advocates for change. Rather than to see ourselves as irrelevant and inconsequential to society—that is, as a problem—we sincerely need to be counter-cultural and consequential. From our belief in “soul liberty” we can freely dialogue and interact with people from other faiths with respect and appreciation. Our current commitment in advancing the Baptist/Muslim dialogue is indicative of this. Our multicultural diversity within a non-majority denomination is permitting us to listen to voices that we were not able to hear before, thus positioning ABC to bring about a closer reflection to the likeness of the beloved community that the world needs to see. And as an American Baptist, I like to talk about Jesus Christ. I know that in my own life, Jesus is my Lord and Savior and I want our denomination to stand up for Jesus in a world that badly needs a Savior.

Q: Do you see specific priorities for our work?
A: As we all know, the squeaky wheel gets the grease. There are many priorities that we must address, but if there’s one thing that I have learned in my 20 years in EM and now 16 years at the church, it is that one has to stay awhile to make things happen. The challenges that we have are not short-termed fixes but deep-seeded problems that require a long time to change. We say these are adaptive rather than technical changes.

Let me share two illustrations. As we become more diverse in so many different ways, the flip side of that is how are we joined together as one family? We may arrive at this understanding by subscribing to historic Baptist principles or having a common vision or perhaps engaging in mutual projects. Whatever it might be, I think we need a passion to unify us or to articulate why we call ourselves a family. Our local church in San Francisco is clear in its mission to proclaim Christ in Chinatown. Nothing would distract us from that.

My second illustration is the new structure that has been in place for the past two years. We have seen a tremendous response from the 2013 Mission Summit in Overland Park, Kansas, followed by the Mission Table at Green Lake in November. At both of these national ABC events—comprising of people from all parts of the family—was the opportunity to gather around tables to discuss ministry topics. One may say, what is so novel about that? But the intriguing result is that we may have tapped into a deep want in people that has been there and we haven’t been aware of. American Baptists have good ideas to share. They have issues... on their minds. They have passions in their hearts. And just providing the forum for people to share and exchange ideas has been redemptive and uplifting. We are planning to have table conversations again when we meet for the 2015 Biennial Mission Summit.

What excites you most about being ABC president? If you could summarize your message of challenge and hope to the people with whom you are meeting and worshipping, what would that be?

I realized that when I was elected as president in June 2013, I would be the first Asian American to become ABCUSA president. This goes back to my thoughts of humble beginnings in Boston. How could God possibly lead a Chinese boy who spoke Chinese before English, grew up in the ghettos of Roxbury and usually would not raise his hand in class, to become president. When I travel and speak to Baptist groups, I share about how my pastors and Sunday school teachers taught me and equipped me for ministry. I encourage my hearers that while there is always something we can do to improve ABC, there is so much more that we are proud of—and opportunities for them to serve Christ like I prayerfully hope that I have. Why would anyone not want to be associated with people like Martin Luther King Jr., Adoniram and Ann Judson, and Walter Rauschenbusch!

I shared recently at a pastors’ group that I hope I won’t make any serious mistakes as president since in doing so I would bring shame and embarrassment to my Asian American community. They told me that they would pray for me! While my vision is big and hopes are vast, I just hope that I can assist ABC to remain faithful in Christ as it has been and to make some progress. I hope to serve for two years and leave it in a better situation than I received it.

You must be pleased to have had your congregation lifted up in the recent Transformed by the Spirit video as a model of effective ministry by growing through adaptive change. How has First Chinese Baptist Church grown—and changed—to effectively minister amid evolving urban demographics and challenges?

First Chinese Baptist has been very gracious in supporting me in my service to the denomination while I remain fulltime as its pastor. They know that they won’t see me as much, but with gifted leaders and my able pastoral staff colleagues, they are carrying on the mission well. Our church was originally the Chinese Baptist Mission, owned and sponsored by the American Baptist Home Mission Society in 1880. When the church was destroyed in the 1906 earthquake, funds were collected from all over the denomination to rebuild the mission that was completed in 1908. This is to say that our church has always been an integral part of ABC life and heritage, and my serving as president simply continues that commitment today. Our church continues to grow and ministers to our local community in Chinatown. With almost 600 in our membership, we have active ministries teaching English and citizenship classes to new immigrants, as well as summer day camp for community children. A new outreach program called Reception Ministry was started last month to give out leaflets on Grant Avenue inviting neighbors, visitors and tourists to come into our sanctuary for prayer or a cup of Lanna coffee from our ABC Thailand missionaries Mike and Becky Mann. Our church members come from as far as 60 miles away to be involved in our ministries.

As seen in the Transformed by the Spirit video, we have invested in the Chinatown YMCA across the street by helping them renovate their gym. And in exchange we now have another attractive venue for one of our Sunday morning services.
The Mission Summit and Mission Table: How do they relate to Transformed by the Spirit?

Ministry challenges are present in every local church, region and organization. Many deal with similar challenges, and use varying strategies to meet and solve these challenges.

Participants from ABC regions, seminaries, and national agencies joined together in conversation at the first ever ABC Mission Table in early November, 2013, to focus on 32 ministry challenges and to discern, listen and learn from one another. The 32 topics were determined from a national survey which was a part of the Transformed by the Spirit initiative, and were originally discussed at the June 2013 Mission Summit prior to the Mission Table.
