Reliable studies have shown that workers with disabilities, trained and placed appropriately, perform as well as or better than persons without disabilities. Current experience with supported and supportive work approaches is demonstrating the benefits of employment in nonsheltered work places to employers, individuals with disabilities and the community. Further, we are aware that in our society the gainful employment of persons with disabilities not only helps to increase their positive image, but also benefits the national economy. This enables individuals with disabilities to serve God and other persons more fruitfully in accord with their desires. We, therefore, urge our churches to support efforts designed to encourage the employment of persons with disabilities.

At the national level, landmark laws such as the Rehabilitation Acts, The Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) and the American Disabilities Act (ADA) seek to assure the rights to persons with disabilities in employment and housing and public access.
